He had collected but a few clusters, before he saw a squirrel scampering over the dried leaves, and making for the nearest tree. He instantly set up a loud shout, and abandoning his employment, ran after him, calling upon the rest of us to join in the pursuit. Let the squirrel alone George, said Frank, we can t catch him. He is a great deal too nimble for us. 10. But I can knock him off the branch where he sits, with a stone, and then I can catch him. We all exclaimed against this, for it was but a little striped squirrel, which would be good for nothing when dead, and hitting him with a stone would be almost sure to kill him. With some difficulty we prevailed on George not to molest him, but to content himself with watching his graceful attitudes and quick motions on the tree; and in this amusement he spent the rest of the morning. At noon, we seated ourselves in one of the little arbors, and opening the store of ham, cakes and tarts, which our careful mothers had put up for us the night before, we made a most sumptuous meal of them. Our dessert hung within reach from the vines. QUESTIONS. At what time did the boys set out on their excursion? Did they find the place readily? Where did Charles propose...
