The settlement of Chicago had scarcely begun sixty years since, and the story of the city s growth reads like a fairy tale. Its first census was taken in 1829, and showed less than ten families outside Fort Dearborn, which contained a small United States garrison. Soon afterward the prospect that a canal would be constructed from that point to La Salle, ninety-six miles distant, began to attract settlers; some 400 came in 1831, followed by others in 1832, when the first school was opened with twelve pupils, and the first Sunday-school with thirteen. Work on the canal began in 1836, the city was incorporated in 1837, and in 1840 the census showed a total population somewhat below 4,500, with a total valuation of $94,437. The canal was completed in 1848, and in 1850 the population had increased to above 28,000. By this time the enterprising from all portions of the country had begun to discern the possibilities of the lakeside city, and business men, full of energy and determination, came flocking to the scene. In 1860 there were over 109,000 souls within the corporate limits; in 1870, more than 306,000; in 1880, 503,000; while 1890 showed the remarkable figures of 1,098,576. A portion of the increase of the last decade was due to the annexation of outlying towns whose interests were identical...
