By the time he had reached the Queen s Road, Foulerton had forgotten what the Comedy was about. He fell asleep trying to trace a coherent plot behind its glamour; but as that had been obliterated by the manager for fear of making his audience think, the Major s failure was less discreditable to his intellect than he supposed. On the following morning after breakfast he took the same train to Brighton by which Mrs. St. George had travelled three days before. Foulerton found Brighton smarting under a warm sun and a biting wind. As it was a regular March day he enjoyed it patriotically. He thought the grey-green Channel, shrinking back, petulant and wrinkled, under the whip of the breeze, lovelier than the dark-blue tropic seas he had lately crossed. The cabman turned up the collar of his coat;...
