He is tearful, repentant, homesick and embittered; he howls and weeps over his lost prestige until his own servants and fellow-sufferers can stand it no longer, and openly poke fun at him, even in their songs of homage. He is moody, afraid to be left alone, vacillating in his commands, and nervous when his emissaries are absent too long on their errands. A sense of humor is his only pleasing attribute, a humor directed for the most part against the clergy, whom he hates for their arrogance and immorality, but which is turned on occasion against himself, as where he assures us that he resembles mightily a blacksmith, or likens the glow of his countenance to that of a rusty pan. His most attractive act is his leniency to the fallen girl, whom he excuses from punishment because she transgressed, not from greed, but for the sake of..
